Beecher on Guiteau.

At a public dinner in New York, Henry Ward Beecher spoke of the Guiteau trial. He said : I think that the man who received an inspiration dropped to him from the same direclieve he came as near it as a man can, and remain same. It shows the peculiar effect which an overweening development of pride and vanity produces. There are people who no, matter what their moral conviction is, think a thing is right after they have done it. I congratulate von that the trial is ended, er that a man should shoot the Presistreet, should be in prison and then Bill to authorize the County Commis intelligent mind recognized in the daily the gallows can stand thirty or forty tegrity of the learned gentlemen who and, screaming louder than ever, whom Mr. Gloam communicated the sioners of the several Counties in the transaction of life.
